Read the Passage

Every Saturday morning, Maya and her brother Andre walked with their aunt to a small community garden near Porus. At first, Maya thought the garden looked ordinary, but Aunt Sonia told them that it was once an empty lot filled with old bottles and dry bush. Now, neat rows of callaloo, tomatoes, pak choi, and peppers grew beside a rain barrel.

One morning, the sky was cloudy and the air felt cool. Andre wanted to rush home before the rain started, but Aunt Sonia pointed to the dark soil. “The seedlings are thirsty,” she said. “A little rain would be a blessing today.”

Maya noticed a group of younger children standing near the gate. They looked hesitant, holding their small packets of seeds tightly. Maya remembered how nervous she had felt on her first day in the garden. She smiled and said, “Come, I will show you where to plant them.”

By midday, the clouds had passed without heavy rain. The children had planted their seeds, labelled the rows, and watered the soil. Aunt Sonia nodded proudly. “A garden grows best when many hands care for it,” she said. Maya looked at the tiny seedlings and imagined them becoming healthy vegetables for families in the community.
